

Efforts to reduce the environmental impact of construction projects are being made at the local, national, and international levels. The World Bank, for example, has developed a set of guidelines for sustainable development that can be used by governments and businesses to guide their activities. The World Bank's guidelines include recommendations for reducing energy consumption, conserving water, and protecting the environment. The World Bank's guidelines also encourage the use of renewable energy sources, such as solar and wind power, and the use of sustainable building materials. The World Bank's guidelines also encourage the use of sustainable building materials, such as bamboo and recycled materials.
